    Stanley Fish, a New York Times author, wrote an article titled "Plagiarism is Not a Big Moral Deal" in which he argues that plagiarism is not a serious moral issue. Fish's main points are that:

        Plagiarism is a breach of disciplinary decorum, not a moral breach

        Plagiarism is a learned sin, not a philosophical issue
        Students who don't fully understand the concept of plagiarism aren't committing a crime
        The rules of plagiarism are more like the rules of golf, which are considered more unusual and harsh than other sports

	In every former change in medium (radio, TV, early internet), we could assume a human agent had a role in producing discourse. GenAI creates 'original' writing based on an algorithmic assessment of a corpus of human writing, but it doesn't require a human agent (who were the seat of communicative intentions, meanings, and values).

        Some institutional policies are overly punitive which is one of the reasons some educators are resistant to officially reporting suspected academic integrity misconduct and elect to resolve informally with student in a more relational and restorative justice approach.         Do you have any examples of assessing students' understanding/ knowledge that might encourage IA use but limit the possibility of them generating it using IA? e.g. I might ask students to critique/ evaluate a IA-generated response. A IA can generate this evaluation themselves which makes my assessment of their skill difficult. Any idea?
11:50:11 From Aniklet Zefi to Everyone:
        @Daniel, I've seen some interesting ways where an instructor gives video feedback on student work using a tool like Loom for example. He will then use AI to generate a transcript and draw out the key takeaways for his feedback. But I agree it's not reliable as a default strategy.
11:50:27 From Leon King to Everyone:
        Problem: How do I know when the class size is 30-60 (college level) what the students actually know when what they present is largely or even entirely generated by AI? One doesn't have time to individually interview students. Nor is creativity and analysis a useful criteria — AI by generating a wide variety of combinations will appear to be creative. Without knowing what the students know I cannot tailor my material to addressing actual learning problems.

11:59:10 From P Moore to Everyone:
        Thanks - thought provoking session -- but must go to next meeting.
11:59:18 From Patricia Larose to Everyone:
        The environmental impact from these LLM models is what stops me from using them
11:59:48 From Tom D'Amico to Everyone:
        Thanks - great insights and your comments apply equally to K-12 and post secondary.
12:00:17 From Lalit Lobo to Everyone:
        Thank you for the very in-depth presentation. Lots more to learn "non-stop" in this journey. Wonder what AI 2.0 will look like?

        Thank you!🙌
12:00:59 From Leon King to Everyone:
        How can I assess students and modify my presentations to help them when I don't know if the work they submitted is their own? I don't have time to individually interview 30+ students per assignment.
12:01:05 From GR Witthaus to Everyone:
